ABSTRACT: The highly changeable and inconstant condition of organizational environments, including public and private sectors, has led to a need for more communication, cooperation, and collaboration. This study examines the necessity of policy making for organizations, and provides an insight into policy making from a network perspective. A social network analysis was used to examine the need for cooperation among network actors. The results of this study show that network actors can benefit from each other's resources and capabilities to develop and implement effective policies. Finally, the study provides theoretical and applied suggestions to help organizations progress in this direction.
