ABSTRACT:

Adolescents egocentrism is a controversial concept in cognitive developmental theories and there are little studies that investigated in what condition this egocentrism is effective. The present study is being carried out to explore the role of separation-individuation in mediating the relationship between communication dimensions and imaginary audience. Using the three dimensions of communication in the interpersonal model of communication, the relationship between these dimensions and imaginary audience was examined. Utilizing the path analysis method, the role of separation-individuation in mediating the relationship between communication dimensions and imaginary audience was evaluated. Results of the study clearly revealed the mediation role of PATHSEP between FCP and IA. This explanatory model is elaborated in the article.

ABSTRACT: The highly changeable and inconstant condition of organizational environments, including public and private sectors, requires the need for adopting the concept of networks in organizing processes. This means the development of organizational structure based on a network of relationships. In this regard, the network structure is considered as a modern approach which can provide the most useful and effective network for coping with the uncertain conditions of today’s organizations. The proposed concept of network management deals with a new approach to the development of organizational structure. It finally provided theoretical and applied suggestions in order to prepare organizations for progressing in this direction.
